Nature of opportunity: Varied, case referral for representation or investigation, shorter-term litigation, or non-litigation opportunities.

General information: PLS refers civil rights and medical malpractice cases to qualified attorneys via their Pro Bono Referral Network. These cases often include claims for excessive force, failure to protect, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, or discrimination, among other issues. PLS screens intakes and conducts an initial investigation to evaluate whether there is a sound basis for relief on the merits of the case and what procedural obstacles, if any, exist. Opportunities include:

- Short-term Litigation: PLS occasionally refers to medical parole (compassionate release) clients whose petitions for release were denied by the Commissioner. Pro bono attorneys can then challenge the denial by filing a certiorari action in Superior Court.
- Case referral: either for representation or investigation.
- Brutality investigations: PLS's Prison Brutality Project investigates allegations of guard

	brutality/excessive force and litigates or refers lawsuits based on the results of their investigations. After gathering relevant documentation, pro bono volunteers review and summarize the record, assess the strengths and weaknesses, and make a recommendation as to whether there is a viable lawsuit that PLS can litigate or refer to. <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>● Medical Advocacy: PLS receives thousands of intakes from incarcerated people each year who suffer from inadequate healthcare in the DOC and county facilities. Pro bono volunteers help by reviewing medical records, consulting with pro bono doctors where necessary, and writing advocacy letters on behalf of clients. Where advocacy fails to achieve the desired results, pro bono volunteers summarize the record, assess the strengths and weaknesses, and make a recommendation as to whether there is a viable lawsuit for injunctive relief.</li> <li>● Medical Parole Petitions: The Massachusetts medical parole statute requires the release of individuals who are terminally ill or permanently incapacitated. PLS works with pro bono counsel to file petitions for medical parole, including reviewing the client's medical records, working with pro bono doctors to assess the client, ensuring that the client has a suitable parole plan, drafting and filing a petition with the Department of Corrections, and arguing on the client's behalf at a hearing before the DOC Commissioner.</li> <li>● Public Records Requests: PLS occasionally needs pro bono support requesting public records and summarizing or analyzing the information received.</li> </ul> Malpractice insurance: Not provided; attorneys must have their own. Training and/or mentoring: Provided.
